YOUR PARTY, YOUR PROBLEM

When you host a party, you want it to be a good time – an opportunity for you and your guest to unwind a little. When alcohol is involved, unwinding can sometimes go too far: the actions of the intoxicated guest can lead to death or injury. And you can be held responsible, whether you're a private citizen, an employer, or the owner of a commercial establishment. You can be sued – and sued big – even if you didn't actually serve a drop of liquor.

SERVING INTOXICATED PATRONS

Many of us are familiar with the kind of case in which a tavern or bar is sued when an intoxicated patron leaves the premises and injures or kills someone while driving home. Licensed establishments have legal responsibilities to prevent people from becoming drunk and to stop serving people who are already drunk. What many people don't realize, says University of Western Ontario law professor Robert Solomon, is that the same tough principles are being applied to social hosts.

SUING THE SOCIAL HOST

The first Canadian case to address a social host's liability for serving alcohol was Baumeister. He was rendered a quadriplegic in a car accident following a high school graduation party at the Carefoot's home. He sued the driver and the Carefoots. The court indicated that social hosts, like bars, could be held liable for serving intoxicated guests who subsequently injure themselves or others. In addition, to liability as a provider of alcohol, a homeowner may be held liable as an occupier (a person who has control of the premises).

LOSING CONTROL

That's' what happened to Fulton when his son threw a "bush party" on the family property. One of the 300 participants, Meunier, got drunk and started a fight that left him a quadriplegic. He sued, claiming that Fulton responsible for allowing an event to take place, which he should have realized, was potentially dangerous. This was not the first "bush party" on the Fulton property that had resulted in problems. Fulton's insurance company settled out of court for $700,000, even though Fulton's son hadn't provided alcohol to anyone, and hadn't even formally invited anyone to the party.

EXPANDING LEGAL RESPONSIBILITY

As the Baumeister and Meunier cases suggest there has been a clear trend towards increasing the legal responsibility of anyone who provides alcohol or hosts events where people are drinking.

No "quick fixes"

Various strategies have been advanced to reduce the risks of a civil suit, including designated driver programs, waivers of liability, and even special-events insurance. But, Prof. Solomon cautions, the "piece-meal adoption of isolated initiatives" cannot take the place of a comprehensive strategy to reduce the risks associated with alcohol. For example, while designated drivers and alternative transportation policies address the major risk of drinking and driving, it may lull host into a false sense that they can serve their non-driving guests as much alcohol as they want. However, if a drunken guest falls down the stairs, walks through a patio door, or starts a fight, the homeowner may be successfully sued.

Being a good host means protecting your guests, yourself and others, as well as having a good time.
